Cory James has never known a life where she wasn't running. Running from the cops, her home, her past. Running from love. The only time she's free is when she throws on her hood and takes to the roofs to become a part of New York, to climb to a place in the city where she doesn't feel alone. Stealing is nothing, lying inevitable, byproducts of survival. A way for Cory to provide for herself and for her younger sister, Jill, give her the life Cory couldn't have. For five years, Cory set up a long line of teetering dominos, one by one, choice by choice. Meeting Van is the first domino to fall, and once they crash into each other, it's only a matter of time before her whole world is in danger of falling apart. She can tell herself over and over again that she doesn't care, but it's a lie. She knows it from the first time she says his name, but she can't let him in, not when she has a job to do, a job that could rip her life apart at the seams. One that she'll have to betray Van to finish. Hell follow however high she can climb, but she can only run for so long before she has to choose.
